Contextualizing Canadian defence spending

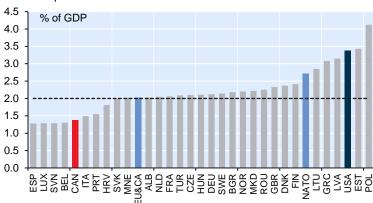

By Taylor Schleich

Prime Minister Carney announced today that the government will accelerate its military spending, a decision that will result in Canada meeting NATO's 2% of GDP defence spending target this fiscal year. While it sounds like a major policy shift, this announcement isn't all that surprising (we hinted at this possibility months ago, here) and the marginal dollars may not be as significant as meets the eye.

First some context. Canada undershot NATO's 2% of GDP defence spending target in 2024, with only 5 of 32 countries spending less. This isn't anything new as it's been nearly 50 years since Ottawa allotted 2% of GDP to the military. Canada used to have more company below the 2% mark but European allies (e.g., Germany) ramped up spending in recent years.

After the U.S. election, it became clear that the Western military order, long anchored (and funded) by American leadership, had fractured. President Trump intensified demands for NATO allies to shoulder more of the defence burden, an issue that even featured in Canada's federal vote. For the governing Liberal Party, their election platform made an explicit pledge to "exceed our commitment to spend at least 2% of GDP on defence". The exact timeline wasn't specified but platform costing suggested it would be near the end of the four-year plan.

Source: NBC, PBO | Note: $9 bln announced today = 1.95% of GDP (2% rounded)

Today's announcement pulls forward that timeline, so it's natural to wonder what the fiscal cost will be. For context, the PBO estimated last year that $41 billion would be spent on defence in 2024-25 (1.4% of GDP). To reach 2% this fiscal year then, it would require an additional ~$20 billion. This sounds significant but consider the following: The federal government had already budgeted for a major step up in military spending with $52 billion earmarked for 2025-26. So before any new measures, you're already halfway there. Add in the spending announced today, amounting to $9 billion, and defence outlays become aligned with the NATO commitment.

We don't want to trivialize $9 billion but many of these expenditures were announced on the campaign trail and are now just being pulled forward. True, only $2 billion was originally allocated to FY25 but that still reduces the new red ink relative to the post-election baseline to ~$7 billion. We don't think that should produce a serious bond market reaction. Of course, defence is one of many spending pressures Ottawa faces. This and tax cuts and other measures will widen the deficit. But today's notice, on its own, won't wholly recast the fiscal outlook. And examined through a wider lens, it could prove to be a high-ROI trade if it can secure Canada tariff relief (to say nothing of the multiplier effects from a Made in Canada defence plan).
