April's most extraordinary foreign investors flows

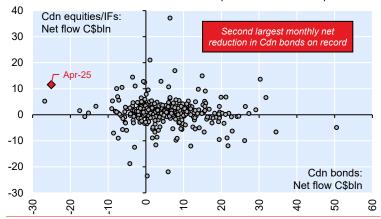

By Warren Lovely

April 2025 was one of the more extraordinary months most market participants have lived through. President Trump's 'Liberation Day' antics injected tremendous uncertainty into financial markets and all corners of the globe. Canada was not immune. So it's perhaps less than surprisingly that much of our April data looks, well, extraordinary. So it was with today's international transactions in securities release.

The most shocking headline: Foreign investors cut their holdings of Canadian bonds by a whopping $25 billion in April, the second largest net outflow on record. Interestingly, the dive in non-resident holdings of Canadian bonds came as foreign investors were 'taking refuge' in Canadian stocks (which isn't the way this often goes). Meantime, Canadians sought shelter in U.S. Treasuries... you know, that recently downgraded sovereign with an increasingly big (but perhaps not-so-beautiful) budget deficit. You can't make this stuff up. So what gives?

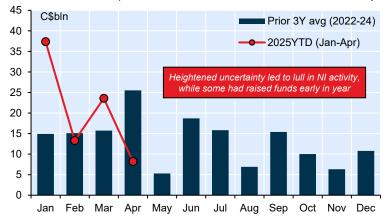

Keying on foreign flows in Canadian bonds, this is really a primary market story. (Note: Secondary market flows produced net foreign buying of Canadian bonds for a 20th consecutive month.) Normally, April tends to be one of the busiest months of the year when it comes to Canadian bond issuers tapping foreign currency markets (most notably USD). But with tariff-related volatility unnerving investors and issuers alike, the new issue machine sputtered. Meantime, with so many Canadian bonds now held outside the country, retirements result in an ever-larger net outflow, which was certainly the case in April.

In the end, this looks less like a foreign 'buyers strike' and more like a temporary 'issuers boycott'. Temporary being the operative word, since Canadian bond issuers returned to international markets as tariff turbulence subsided. The bevy of bond deals more recently brought by Canadian provinces, Crowns/PSEs and private corporations hint at scope for a recovery in non-resident holdings, with the surging Canadian dollar likewise suggests foreign investors are very much interested in Canada. As a final aside: Digging into these data you will also find that the Government of Canada saw net foreign buying of its paper in April, as inflows into GoC T-bills more than offset a modest net outflow on GoC bonds. Extraordinary yes, but it seems all is not lost.
