

These models say cuts aren't really necessary

By Taylor Schleich & Noah Black

Last week, Treasury Secretary Scott Bessent remarked on Bloomberg TV that “if you look at any model [...] we should probably be 150, 175 bps lower [on Fed funds].” Bessent walked those comments back the following day but that was presumably because most models are not indicating that. Take perhaps the best-known model for prescribing monetary policy: the Taylor Rule. The Atlanta Fed publishes 30 different Taylor Rule estimates using various assumptions for the neutral rate and economic gap. Most specifications say policy is appropriately calibrated or it's not restrictive enough. A few imply scope for modest easing, but it's difficult to generate a Fed funds prescription near 3%.

Nonetheless, a cut next month seems like a forgone conclusion at this point, so just how unique would a cut with this backdrop? It's notable that above-target inflation hasn't prevented Fed cuts before. In fact, all but two Fed cuts over the last 30 years occurred with >2% core CPI. However, just three took place with this gauge above 3% and all of them were in 2024. More commonly, cuts are employed to defend the other side of the mandate: employment. Indeed, the unemployment rate has been rising around the majority of Fed cuts since 1995 (including the three cuts last year). However, Jul-25's jobless rate of 4.2% is unchanged from Jul-24 and most see only slight increases from here.

While past Fed cuts have occurred with >2% CPI inflation, in nearly all cases, disinflation follows. That may not repeat for the late 2024 cuts, but at least last year, lower (or at a minimum stable) inflation was widely expected. Today, 1-year inflation swaps point to higher inflation ahead.

At the end of the day, Fed policy is still modestly above neutral so a few, gradual cuts may be justifiable. However, with inflation risks elevated and price stability unlikely to be achieved until at least 2027, the FOMC needs to tread carefully. As it stands, we expect only modest longer-term rate relief in the context of 100 bps of rate cuts. However, a more dovish Fed could send yields higher (even as front-end yields fall) as investors build in a greater inflation/risk premium.
